

Collaborations and the makings of the global graduate

Professor Susan Elliott, Deputy Provost and Deputy Vice-Chancellor (International), The University of Melbourne

The desire and demand for an international education is a growing global trend and Australia, with its well-regarded institutions, safe environment and strong policy framework, remains a highly attractive destination. Students are increasingly seeking a global experience within their studies – be it through studying overseas, an emphasis on global issues, interactions with international peers and faculties or mobility experiences. The increased levels of international focus requires higher education institutions to think of new and innovative ways to offer students the global education that they desire. Increasingly, collaborations with partner organisations outside of the education space, are being formed to help shape the range and breadth of services for students. Professor Susan Elliott will outline the importance for public spirited institutions in developing collaborative partnerships, to enhance the outcomes for their global graduates.
